THE DEVIL'S CUT weave true tales of their beloved home, Lansing, Michigan, being overtaken by outside forces: the nickel-and-dimers, factory farmers, violence, death, and greed, the guy that appears better for the girl and steals her away. They wear tour shirts that say "Fuck Monsanto." They drink Old Crow. And when they play "Caroline," they shout "we drink Crow," and everyone yells with a release of rage and drunken dignity "OLD CROW!" You feel a part of something. Something old, new, long standing.

"We have one of the worst economies, and due to that you have limited places to play. However, that has also really helped to create an underground community where people stick together, getting behind what is going on at the grassroots level. This communal aspect really comes through in our work, wherein most of the lyrical material and/or musical feel is based around the struggles that we all face due to a failing system", says drummer Derek Vaive.

They also write with glaring clarity about how we as people change, over time, when we move, when we age, when addiction strikes, when we fall in and out of love, when we try to fix something too broken, when we lose the people that matter to circumstances far beyond our control. It is true American folk poetry set to a sound that makes you want to mosh the shit out of your body.

Says Vaive, "...when those of us who do dwell on the bottom rungs of the social dynamic - sometimes by force, sometimes by choice - come together, beautiful things are created, struggles purged, and life is again given meaning. That's what our home has done for us."
